The choice is yours
University of California

The University of California (UC) offers a voluntary short- and long-term disability plan through which employees can continue to receive benefits while absent due to a disability — such as, injury, illness, or maternity.

Your choice case studies

Family matters
I am a nurse who just started at UC. I’m 28-years old and thinking about starting a family in the next couple of years. I enrolled in both voluntary short- and long-term disability since I don’t have 22 days of sick leave built up yet and I may need to use my sick leave more frequently than some others due to starting a family.

Wants choices
I am a 36-year-old facilities worker. I have worked at the University of California for 18 years. Although I have almost six months of sick leave saved up, I decided to enroll in both voluntary short- and long-term disability. I have enough sick leave and personal savings to allow me to weather any short duration health issues; however, I have a chronic medical condition and may not be able to enroll in voluntary short-term disability in the future.

Healthy and solvent
I’m 53. I’ve been a pharmacist at UC for 22 years. I have a lot of sick time built up. I’m healthy and have the financial resources to support myself for 6 to 9 months if I had to go out of work on disability. I reduced my premium costs by electing voluntary long-term disability only because I balanced the risks. The choice was easy for me.

Made a change
I’m 62 and have been an analyst with UC for more than 30 years. When I updated my elections during open enrollment, I chose the voluntary short-term disability benefit only and discontinued my voluntary long-term disability. Updating my choice made sense because at this point in my career, if I were to become seriously disabled, I would file for retirement. By enrolling in the voluntary short-term disability plan only, it allows me to be covered for any short-term disability absence only. With the new voluntary short-term disability only option available to me, I feel more financially secure.
